Hi Dana,

Per our schedule, I just switched you ad for the next two weeks on Rise & Shine. Below is a text using today's editorial.

We'll be off on Monday, so this will start next Tuesday.

Thanks and have a great weekend.

Frank

RISE & SHINE today's education news

It was evening and it was morning, a fourth day, and the Denver school district and teachers union said let there be a deal, and there was a deal.

If you saw our email a few short hours ago, you already know Denver Public Schools and the Denver Classroom Teachers Association reached a tentative agreement early Thursday, after three days of a teacher strike and an all-night bargaining session. Melanie was there for some 23 hours to bring you the news.

So, teachers, was it worth it? How do you feel, not just about this deal but about the strike and how relations might change between teachers and the district? How do you get students back to normal? What does healing look like? What will it be like to work alongside colleagues who made the opposite decision about teaching or striking?

And parents, what's your take on all this?

Let us know in our online survey. We'd love to hear from you.

And we also have non-strike news from Adams 14, where a divided school board chose the neighboring Mapleton school district to serve as its external manager. Yesenia has that one.

Thanks for reading!

IT'S OVER On dawn of the fourth day, the Denver school district and teachers union announced an agreement that gives teachers significant raises and a more traditional pay system, while keeping incentives for teachers at high-poverty schools that the district believes are essential. Chalkbeat

FIRST PERSON Denver teachers were fighting for higher and more stable pay in their strike. Many teachers make personal sacrifices to work in the district and in the profession. For this teacher, that has included not having her own children. Chalkbeat

PRESS PASS Lawyers allege the principal of Denver's East High School violated at least one student's First Amendment rights as he tried to prevent the spread of videos and photos taken inside the school during the strike. Denver Post

IN THEIR OWN WORDS Video: Why this Denver teacher participated in the strike and what the experience was like for her. Denver Post

GOOD NEIGHBORS A divided Adams 14 school board chose the neighboring Mapleton school district to serve as its external manager, following a recommendation from a community review committee and disregarding warnings from the state education department. The State Board of Education still needs to sign off. Chalkbeat

DOUBLE DUTY The Harrison school district is looking to hire two superintendents to work as equal partners, and it's also planning to suspend its merit pay system amid widespread employee dissatisfaction. Gazette

COMMUNITY VISION A group of education advocates in the Pueblo 60 district wants the State Board of Education to let them use the community schools model to turn around long-struggling schools. Chieftain

As we reported recently, a bill making its way through the Colorado legislature would promote that idea by making it official that innovation schools, which get exemptions from certain state and district rules, can be community schools. Chalkbeat
